

Preparing for a New Year of Blogs

Preparing for a New Year of Blogs

I recently decided to return to the classroom to help second grade students learn basic subjects. I am also considering becoming a substitute or long-term part-time teacher for a local school. When I write the blogs and parenting articles for families, I need constant contact with kids and their parents. This challenge has been solved by:

Providing workshops on parent education topics for schools and nonprofits serving families and education
Distributing reading materials for families at workshops and community fairs
Reading to kids and families at local events
Demonstrating how kids learn when playing with toys at toy stores and through community presentations
Working with teachers and parents in classrooms and modeling how to differentiate learning strategies for children

We Support Our Readers' Needs

When we prepare for our blogging work in 2020, our blogging team is reflecting on our many successes and how we can support our readers' ongoing concerns. We find that:

We must continue to provide parents with opportunities to help their children succeed as learners in the challenging times in our communities. Parents can ensure that their children feel safe and secure in their daily lives at home and at school. Families should balance each day to find time for themselves and for each child.

We can help our children explore careers through volunteering, internships, and summer jobs.

Our community must respond to those in need to foster healthy growth for all through community services, service-learning activities, and family projects. Families and schools can help children develop their personal ethics and morality. They can reinforce a family's values and the school's guidelines for healthy and supportive learning for all.

All of us can nurture healthy emotional serenity. We can appreciate all that we have and express our gratitude to our family, friends, and community members.

Much peace and enlightenment this holiday season and the coming year!
