How to Reduce Bullying at School

Each day our children are exposed to incidents of teasing, criticizing, and belittling. How children respond to these subtle, but destructive statements, can make a huge difference in their daily experiences at school.

For example, one child may tease another at lunch about what he is eating. It may be that the child has food allergies and cannot eat certain foods. In another situation, a child may be eating foods that are unique to a culture. Regardless of the reason, children must learn to respect the individual differences of their classmates. Most schools focus on teaching children how to get along with others. Many schools grade children on their behavior with their classmates and their teacher. In California, schools have established strict guidelines on how students are to report bullying incidents to their teacher and school personnel.

Strategies

Parents can guide their children in how to respond to these difficult situations in several ways:

Teach your children to express their feelings when they are being criticized or when they feel uncomfortable in a situation.

Help your child articulate how they feel when someone harasses them.

Encourage your child to also tell the teacher when he is feeling threatened or uncomfortable about a situation.

Discuss awkward or uncomfortable situations with your child to ensure that you understand what your child is experiencing.

If your child has reported a bullying event at school to you, meet with the teacher to coordinate a follow-up plan.

Conferences with the teacher can provide insight to your child's behavior. For example, a child may bully another child if he has been bullied at school or home. Therefore, the child that is acting as a bully needs to be trained in how to overcome this learned behavior.

Overcome Bullying

Children learn from observing and interacting with the people around them, both children and adults. When a child experiences a bullying behavior, it is important to teach the child how to be a survivor by clearly communicating to the bully, the teacher, and the parents.

Much success in overcoming bullying challenges!
